AMERICAN STUDIO GLASS

The 1960s cultural world was marked by creative Americans making major statements worldwide. While the world was listening to rock and roll, American artists working with glass were quietly emerging. With the invention of the first studio glass furnace introduced by Harvey Littleton in 1962 and Dale Chihuly allowing the "glass to lead", glass sculpture has over the last 55 years finally realized its importance to contemporary American Art. Imagine Museum is leading the way in recognizing the artists who forged the path and those continuing to create using glass as their means of expression and communication.
